BACON OR SHAKESPEARE?

The death of Ignatius Donnelly, author of the Baconian cipher, revives in- libe to the discredit of Senator Chandterest in the theory that Lord Bacon wrote the plays attributed to Shakespeare. Briefly stated, the argument with which this theory is borne up is that Shakespeare was not literate with anybody, and neither of his daughters could read or write, for

Could such a man, ask the Baconians, have written thirty-six plays which are packed so full of wit and wisdom that the world stands amazed at the intellectual attainments of their author? Poetry may come by inspiration but learning does not. The man who wrote the plays was a lawyer, a musician, a military student, a profound master of all the languages of Europe, and had traveled extensively. Chief Justice Campbell said that the playwright was a lawyer so able and learned that had the plays been written in Lord Eldon's time he would suspect that eminent jurist of their auth-There are references in the works to law cases which have never
